A diverse group of young adults celebrated the completion of a year-long intensive tech training program that gave them internships at San Francisco Bay Area companies including Facebook, LinkedIn, eBay and Salesforce.com. The program, called Year Up, is in 10 cities nationwide and helps disadvantaged students who have faced struggles such as homelessness and chronic foster care and prepares them for entry-level jobs in tech support, quality assurance testing and data center work. Facebook CIO Tim Campos gave the opening address of the event, Thursday, for the San Francisco branch called Year Up Bay Area.

Alternative Delivery

A photograph of a modern conference room. In the center is a large, light-colored oval table surrounded by several ergonomic office chairs. The room has a drop ceiling with square light fixtures. In the background, there are three large wall-mounted monitors or screens. Potted plants are placed around the room. Overlaid on the right side of the image is a list of alternative delivery methods in dark blue text.
